What happened to the Ocean Princess rigs?

Energy Voice reported in January 2018 that Sepa had opened an investigation and would not let the rigs leave until it received reassurances from the owner. The units in question are the Ocean Princess, Ocean Nomad and Ocean Vanguard, all formerly owned by Diamond Offshore Drilling, which has an office in Aberdeen.

Which North Sea oil rigs will be dismantled legally in Turkey?

Three North Sea oil rigs which were set to be dumped on an Indian beach will now be dismantled legally in Turkey. The Ocean Vanguard, Ocean Princess and Ocean Nomad have been detained in the Cromarty Firth since 2018 by the Scottish Environment Protection Agency. The rigs were formerly owned by Dubai-based Global Marketing Systems (GMS).

What happened to GMS oil rigs?

GMS had purchased the rigs from North Sea oil firm Diamond Offshore, which has a base in Aberdeen. GMS has previously denied that it intended to flout international laws. In June, the company sold the rigs to a new owner which has reached an agreement with Sepa to dismantle them at an accredited shipyard in Turkey.

Did Diamond sell rigs to GMS?

BBC found that Diamond sold five rigs to GMS. According to the documentary, two of the rigs, which had been operating in US waters, were subsequently sold on by GMS and have wound up in shipbreaking yards in Alang, India.

Why are three oil rigs still in the Cromarty Firth?

A trio of oil rigs whose departure from the UK was blocked two years ago amid safety and environmental concerns are still in the Cromarty Firth. Scottish Environment Protection Agency (Sepa) stepped in to prevent the rigs' exit in 2018 after being made aware of concerns they would be illegally taken to beaches in India or Bangladesh for scrapping.

Where did GMS rigs go?

A BBC investigation from 2020 revealed their likely destination was Alang in India, where ships are beached and dismantled by low-paid migrant workers in dirty and often dangerous conditions. GMS had purchased the rigs from North Sea oil firm Diamond Offshore, which has a base in Aberdeen.
