What happened to vantage drilling's jackup rigs?

Last week, small offshore driller Vantage Drilling announced the sale of its remaining jackup rigs to strategic partner ADES Group. At closing, the company and ADES will enter into a three-year management agreement for the rigs.

Is vantage drilling transforming from an offshore driller to a rig management company?

In recent quarters, Dubai-based offshore driller Vantage Drilling has been executing on a number of strategic transactions. In short, the company is transforming from an offshore driller into a provider of rig management services. Since my last update on Vantage Drilling four months ago, the company has remained busy:

What's going on with Vantage drilling & Ades?

At closing, Vantage Drilling and ADES will enter into a three-year management agreement for the rigs, very similar to the transaction involving the jackup rigs Emerald Driller, Sapphire Driller and Aquamarine Driller two years ago.

What happens to vantage drilling's rig assets after the tungsten explorer sale?

Following the proposed sale of the Tungsten Explorer to the new joint venture with TotalEnergies, Vantage Drilling's remaining rig assets will consist of the Platinum Explorer and its 25% stake in the Tungsten Explorer.

How much is vantage drilling's net asset value?

Assuming a sales price of $150 million, Vantage Drilling's net cash position would increase to almost $380 million or approximately $29 per share. However, with the company retaining a 25% stake in the proposed Tungsten Explorer joint venture and a profitable rig management business, the current net asset value ("NAV") might be above $35 per share:

How much will vantage drilling's net cash position increase?

Assuming a sales price of $150 million, Vantage Drilling's net cash position would increase to almost $380 million or approximately $29 per share. However, with the fate of the Platinum Explorer and the company's future strategic direction still unclear, I am reiterating my "Hold" rating on Vantage Drilling's shares.
